 IT'S WHAT'S FOR DINNER!

Cattle: The Ultimate Upcyclers

Every day, cattle graze and unknowingly eat natural resources like soil and energy and generate waste: high quality proteins and other invaluable products. They're upcyclers that take otherwise useless materials and turn them into a valuable resource, and a better product for everyone.

What is Upcycling?
 A method of reducing, reusing, or recycling a material to create a new product. Cattle do this naturally and can be encouraged to do so by feeding them high-quality feed. Cattle convert things that humans can't eat into high-quality meat and other products, reducing waste and creating a sustainable food system.

How Do Cattle Upcycle?
 Cattle don't eat as much as many people think. They graze on the natural plants and trees that surround them, and they use their digestive system to break down the food they eat. They also eat their own manure, which is a natural fertilizer. This means that cattle are a sustainable food source that can be grown in a way that is good for the environment.

#DYK
 Cattle grazing on two acres can produce 100 pounds of beef. That's 100 pounds of beef from just two acres of land. That's a lot of beef from a small amount of land. Cattle are a sustainable food source that can be grown in a way that is good for the environment.

Impact: A Circular Economy
 The real value in upcycling is adding a second, third, or fourth life to a product. Cattle are a natural part of a circular economy. They take in food and produce meat, which is a valuable resource. They also produce manure, which is a natural fertilizer. This means that cattle are a sustainable food source that can be grown in a way that is good for the environment.

Approximately 25% of the world's population is dependent on cattle for their food. Cattle are a natural part of a circular economy. They take in food and produce meat, which is a valuable resource. They also produce manure, which is a natural fertilizer. This means that cattle are a sustainable food source that can be grown in a way that is good for the environment.
